Q.1 Britain has long-standing rules and principles that have been put in place to protect people from being arrested and wrongly held for an indefinite time in custody. I would like you to think about the amount of time people should be held in police custody before they are charged with an offence or are released. For each of the following scenarios please tell me how long you think people should be held in detention for questioning before they are charged or released?

Q.2 Six weeks in custody is equivalent to the prison sentence which someone might serve if found guilty of an offence such as burglary or assault.

Do you still think it is right to hold someone who may be innocent for so long?

Base: All respondents who think people who may be innocent or guilty of a terrorist offence should be held for up to six weeks
